Did you know that labor organizations are dedicated to creating a drug-free environment within the workplace? As a result, unions take the health of their workers very seriously. They appreciate the difficulties of facing high-pressure situations, both at work and in your personal life. They are aware that stress and pressure can encourage unhealthy coping mechanisms, such as addiction. Therefore, labor unions also have a highly effective support system in place to help their employees struggling with addiction. In other words, if you are concerned about failing a drug test (or have failed a drug test) or are worried that your addiction could present a source of risk in the workplace, we strongly recommend reaching out to the management team.

Indeed, the first step to your recovery is to ensure you can get the time and space you need to focus on your health.

Labor unions often have partnerships with addiction treatment centers or even an understanding of the addiction recovery journey. They can recommend programs or centers if you are not sure how to approach the situation. At RAC, we know that labor union workers may not be familiar with what kind of addiction treatment options are the most accessible. So, our team has compiled a brief overview of what is available to those who work with a labor union.

There Is a Ton of Support Available Within the Labor Organization

Of course, you are worried about losing your job because of your addiction. However, not only are labor unions organized and experienced in handling this situation, but they are also highly supportive of addiction recovery programs. With helpful policies in place designed to support their staff, we find that labor unions provide a first source of comfort and guidance for addicted users. Additionally, remember that the law is on your side. You will not lose your job if you join an addiction treatment as a labor union worker.

Therefore, it's important to stay focused on your treatment. Abruptly stopping your treatment for fear of unemployment can be extremely damaging to your recovery. And that's why labor unions support you because they don't want to lose your skills.

Enhanced Healthcare Policies for Addiction Treatments

Labor union healthcare policies are renowned for providing accessible and comprehensive mental health and substance abuse support. You can benefit from better healthcare perks, which means your healthcare package is more likely to provide a better deal than most providers. We offer on our website a simple tool to let you know if your insurance carrier is one of our partners.

Additionally, as mentioned, a lot of union organizations are prepared to handle addiction issues. Many are quick to identify those and direct their employees to the best facilities and programs available. It's good news, as users who are only in the early stage of addiction find it easier to go through a detox or rehab program.

What Are My Addiction Treatment Options?

There is no such thing as one addiction program for all. We approach treatment respecting and acknowledging that every single one of our clients deserves a personalized program. As such, we have more than one addiction option to help you find the path to sobriety.

Outpatient and intensive outpatient programs are best suited for individuals in the early stages of addiction. It is a personalized program committed to helping you every step of the recovery process. For union workers who are concerned about meeting day-to-day commitments and responsibilities, outpatient drug rehab allows you to manage your time without disrupting the treatment. This combines counseling, therapy sessions, and even medication if required. You can also find partial hospitalization treatment that can be followed as an outpatient program.

We also provide full residential detox treatments, which are tailored inpatient programs. These are specifically designed so that there is someone available 24/7 for care, supervision, and support. For labor union workers who struggle with heavy addiction, we find that tailored inpatient options offer the routine and surroundings they need to recover.

Our team works closely with you to assess the duration of each program, ensuring you can recover safely at your pace.
