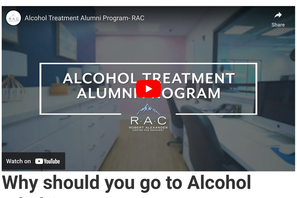
When it comes to alcohol addiction rehab, there are a lot of different options to choose from. You can go to an inpatient facility, or you can do an outpatient program. You can also choose to go to a 90-day rehab program. This is a relatively new option, but it is becoming more and more popular. So, what are the pros and cons of 90-day alcohol addiction rehab?



Why should you go to Alcohol rehab?

There are a few reasons why you might want to go to 90-day alcohol addiction rehab:

- If you have been struggling with alcoholism for a long time, you may need more time in treatment to get sober.
- A longer program may be right for you if you have relapsed multiple times.
- If you have a co-occurring mental health disorder, you may benefit from a longer treatment program.

What is 90-Day Alcohol Addiction Rehab?

90-day alcohol addiction rehab is a longer, more intensive treatment program. It typically includes a detoxification process, followed by inpatient treatment. After you complete the inpatient program, you will transition to an outpatient program. This type of program usually lasts for 90 days, but it can be shorter or longer, depending on your needs.
